"Just Call Me George"

Last summer, Dr. George Sheehan visited our editorial offices in Emmaus, Pennsylvania, for the last time. He had business to transact with the Rodale Book Division, and he had agreed to sit down with me for a 60-minute taped interview.

Sheehan was clearly in the late stages of his seven-year battle with prostate cancer. Thin and drawn despite a blood transfusion the previous day, he needed help negotiating a flight of stairs and walked slowly, unsteadily, on his own.

His deteriorating physical condition had taken no toll on his mind and spirit, however. As soon as we began the interview, I realized this was still the same energetic thinker and explorer we had known for so long. He seemed to relish each new question, particularly any that gave him a chance to talk about his latest project and obsession—the "death book," as he so bluntly called it. (Random House hopes to publish the book in late 1994.)

When I told George the hour was up, he looked surprised and checked his watch. I'm sure he could have gone another 10-K.

—Amy Harford

RUNNER'S WORLD: You've run a lot of tough races in your life and always run them to the last gasp. Is this race against cancer the toughest?

George Sheehan: No, there's nothing to this. It's no race. The challenge now is intellectual and emotional rather than physical.

But there is a similarity to running in the way I'm trying to deal with dying and write about it. The secret to my writing about running was always that I actually experienced everything I wrote about. I had inside information. I took running very seriously and writing about it very seriously. It's like what Thoreau said: there are no small subjects. You can take any subject and bring it to life through your own persona.

We runners, I think, are more or less born to run. Not everyone is born to run, but true runners are. And eventually we figure it out.

We are all, also, born to die eventually. And I believe we have to learn to pursue death and experience everything that happens to us along the way. That's what I'm doing now. I'm exploring the emotional, psychological and spiritual challenges that are offered by the death experience.

And I'm writing about them, just as I did about my running. The method is identical. It's just that the two experiences are diametrically opposed. One is about reaching for peak performances, the other is about atrophy and oblivion.

RW: You've said that at first you couldn't accept this dying experience. Now you have. What changed?

GS: I'm no different from anybody else. When we learn about our cancer, we first try to bargain our way out of it. We say, "I'll be good from now on if only I can get off the book and live longer."

Then we start thinking about a cure. I went to Detroit, the National Institutes of Health, Slean-Kettering. . . . You name it, I went there.

And then finally I realized that no matter what they gave me, the chance for a cure was slim. So at that point I began to accept what was happening to me. And when you reach the stage of acceptance, that more or less puts you in command.

RW: One of the things that has amazed me is that you were able to continue running and racing for so long.

GS: I did that because I was addicted to racing. I can't believe how many races I've run in my life. Even with the cancer, I kept going as long as I could. At one point, I even quit the cancer treatments because I thought my racing was getting too slow. I had lost a minute a mile, so I stopped taking my medication. I wanted to be able to run faster.

And I did. In 1989 I finished seventh in the World Masters Championships in the 70-74 age group. People thought I was out of my mind to stop my shots just because my 5-K times were getting too slow. But I was only thinking about the fact that I had lost a minute per mile, and I couldn't put up with that.

Besides, I always felt that I was an experiment of one, and no one had any history with a patient who stopped taking the cancer medication. No doctor would ever recommend it, and no patient would ever try it.

I figured I would be the one to try. And it turns out, the experiment worked.

RW: What worked?

GS: Stopping the shots that lowered my testosterone. As soon as I did that, my testosterone level came back up, and my muscle function improved. I may not have been as good as I would have been if I had never taken the medication, but I got down to under 35 minutes for a 5-miler.

Then the pain came like a great white shark. I mean, it was ferocious, and I could no longer go on without the medication.

RW: Didn't you wonder that you might have been cutting your life short by going off the medication?

GS: No. The history of these cancers is that there's always a point at which the medication no longer works. Everybody under-
